Gender and Internet Governance eXchange in Asia

To start off our series of gigX, APC in collaboration with the Foundation for Media Alternatives, held a 2-day event on the 29 and 30 June 2015 where advocates from the region came together to exchange knowledge on the intersections of women’s rights and internet governance.

With this initiative, APC aims to strengthen and increase the participation of women’s rights and sexual rights advocates to engage in discussions about internet governance in the region. This will inform dialogues at the global IGF which will be taking place in November.

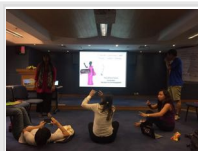

Read about the participant's experiences!

Three things I've learned at the Gender and Internet Governance Exchange, Asia

Two concepts glared at me: Feminist? Internet governance activist? Am I all that? See, I tread carefully around labels because I encounter people who are "allergic" to the word "feminist" or "activist". A feminist or activist is often seen as militant or disruptive and this often spells trouble.

 GENDERIT

The lifelong-learning experience of a young feminist

The Gender and Internet Governance Exchange-Asia (gigX) hosted by the Association for Progressive Communications (APC) in partnership with the Foundation for Media Alternatives (FMA) gave me an opportunity to learn about the intersections between gender and internet governance in a simple way. Honestly, I didn't have much knowledge about internet governance.

Since 2011, APC's Women's Rights Programme has been compiling Gender Report Cards to monitor and assess the level of gender parity and inclusion at the IGF's workshop sessions.

- One challenge that we see is how to engage internet intermediaries to build safer online spheres for women and girls. The development of corporate policies, practices and tools that respect women’s rights is a crucial part of responding to and preventing technology related forms of violence against women.
- Women’s participation in governance procedures and in telecommunications regulatory policies is also necessary.
